¹² Works dealing with all or with several of the languages specified in PD 1101-PF 5959 (Gothic; Scandinavian; English; Dutch; Flemish; Friesian; German). Here are also classified works dealing with Prehistoric German ("Urgermanisch") and with groups or several of the Old Germanic dialects (Anglo-Saxon; Old Saxon; Old high German; Old Norse; Gothic). Libraries preferring to segregate the material on these groups may use the sections PD (1001-1099) for actual classification or, for reference entries only, in the shelf list.

Here are classified treatises (grammars, dictionaries, etc.) dealing with Church Slavic in general as well as those restricted to Old Church Slavic. Treatises emphasizing the vernacular element may be classified with the respective languages and here represented by shelf-list references.

1361-1369	Etymology (Table III).

²³ Here are classified dictionaries professing to be either Serbian or Croatian with equivalents in any of the non-Slavic languages of Europe.

²⁴ No distinction is made between Serbian and Croatian.

²⁵ Here is classified:

(1) Serbo-Croatian literature, General; i. e. treatises on, and editions of, both Serbian and Croatian literary works.

(2) Serbian literature proper (cf. Note 22).

Libraries preferring to keep the Serbian literature apart may make use of the section PG (1500-1558). Works limited to Croatian literature are classified in PG 1600-1697. Libraries not making any specialty of Slavic literature may ignore the sections PG 1500-1697; cf. also PG 560-576 (Yugoslavian literature).

²⁸ The language of the "Little Russians," the inhabitants of Southern Russia ("Russia minor," Ukraine, Ukrainian Socialist Soviet Republic). The original name of the people, Русины (Rusiny; Latin: Rutheni), adhered to the Ruthenian Slavs in the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy (Galicia; Bukovina, Hungary). It has now been abandoned generally in favor of Українці (Ukraintsy), the name adopted by the people in Russia.
